The follow up to her UK number 1 album This Is How Tomorrow Moves, the stark and striking fourth album by beabadoobee is named for the electricity towers that dot every major artery in the world—the strong, spindly structures that reminded Beatrice Laus of her connection to friends and family at home while she was staring down extreme disconnection and isolation on tour over the past few years.

The title can also be read as an allusion to Laus' spiky, forceful new sound—the waves of distortion that crash and shatter across this record's 14 songs mirroring the intense crackle you hear when walking under power lines. The pylon is also a fitting symbol for an album that reckons with the repetitive anxieties of your mid-twenties: What if I'm always going to be this way? What if life is just pylon after pylon on the road?

The album's first single is available to stream and buy from today: "Sun Has Set" introduces Pylon as, in essence, a set of songs that began as diary entries, words that Laus thought she'd never be able to say out loud. "A lot of the songs on this record are things I wish I could have said to someone," she says. "This song has this petty tunnel vision—it's like, I hate you. You're gonna stay here and listen to how much I hate you. Because I never got to say that." The single comes accompanied by a striking first person video directed by Bea's partner and longtime visual collaborator Jake Erland.

Ever a devotee of pure rock music—both as something to be cherished and something to be played with—Laus casts these feelings in songs that touch on classic grunge, midwest emo and '90s radio rock, zeroing in on a sound that is both harsher and more direct than any of her previous records. She says the music she's loved has "always been an influence" on her music, and so for B4 she went straight to the source. A fair few of Beabadoobee's composite influences contributed to Pylon, a fact that speaks to the goodwill and respect Laus has amassed over the course of her relatively brief career.

Hayley Williams sings on "Nothing to Prove," a deeply anthemic indie-rock song about getting your power back from fairweather friends who just want a bit of your success. The moody "Powerlines" features a verse from Turnstile singer Brendan Yates, a master of matching vocal force with emotional nuance. Elsewhere, you'll find contributions from Pinegrove's Evan Stephens Hall, Deftones' Chino Moreno, and Title Fight's Shane Moran, as well as, on "Write Me A Letter", production work from Laus' longtime friends and collaborators Matty Healy and George Daniel of The 1975.

Beabadoobee will debut songs from the record on the Powerlines Tour, her first ever arena shows and biggest tour to date, taking in shows across North America, the UK and Europe this autumn-winter. The Powerlines Tour kicks off 1 October and includes stops at Madison Square Garden, The Kia Forum, The O2 and more (full routing below). Born in the Philippines and raised in London, Beatrice Laus emerged as a British alternative music icon across three acclaimed albums and five EPs. She has garnered multiple BRIT Award and BBC Sound Of nominations, and won NME's Radar award, whilst amassing over 10 billion streams worldwide and more than 12 million followers across her social channels.

This Is How Tomorrow Moves became her first record to reach number 1 on the UK Official Album Chart in 2024, following her Top 10 albums Fake It Flowers (which reached number 8) in 2020 and 2022's Beatopia (#4). Earlier this year, beabadoobee released the one-off single "All I Did Was Dream Of You," teaming up with Grammy-nominated best New Artist The Marías, the result of a longtime mutual creative admiration between María Zardoya and Bea.
